minum is, like copper, it reacts to acidic foods. A soft metal, aluminum also scratches and dents easily.

— Stainless steel is “the bomb,” McPherson said, and what you find in most homes. It’s stable, resists corrosion, and won’t react to acidic foods. But it has poor heat conductivity, so causes food to cook unevenly. To fix that, manufacturers developed three-ply or five-ply pans, stainless steel with a core of aluminum or copper. “We love stainless-steel pans that have a layer of aluminum sandwiched in,” McManus said. “They offer the heat conductivity of aluminum and the workhorse durability of stainless steel.”

Five-ply and copper-core pans cost more, but aren’t that much better.

— Cast iron has been used in cookware for centuries. Cooks swear by it. Extremely durable, cast iron provides excellent heat retention and is inexpensive. With proper care, a cast iron pan can last a lifetime and longer. Its cousin, carbon steel, offers the same benefits with less weight. Both improve with age, but require a little extra care. You need to keep these pans “seasoned” by wiping them with a light coating of oil after each use to create a natural, nonstick surface and prevent rust.
